Research Interest/Specialization My primary interest lies in family, childhood, and culture. Beginning with an early focus on Ethnotheories of Parenting young children in India, I have expanded my attention to understanding the multiple intersections of culture and society and to the ways in which cultural psychology can inform our understanding of diverse phenomenon. By placing culture first, I attempt to help students and doctoral scholars develop culturally sensitive, just, and responsive research methods. Creating an understanding of gender balanced and equitable spaces for all is a strong personal belief which manifests in on-ground project work and classroom research on engendering urban spaces. At present I am working on a collaborative programme to change the social, cultural and structural landscape of urban cities in India.
